Probe into US-Nazi policy inadvisable

The present investigation into allegations that intelligence personnel "violated presidential directives" by making deals with former Nazis to obtain information vital to our defense in the undeclared war being waged against us by the Soviet Union is not in the interest of the United States.

Both President Truman and President Eisenhower were patriotic and practical Americans who had served in the armed forces in wartime and knew what war entailed. When they made their respective proclamations of policy that there would be no "deals" made with Nazis, each of them was undoubtedly well aware that there would be specific instances in which the fundamental interests of the United States would require that that policy be violated.

The proposed inquiry can only result in harassment of loyal Americans who did their duty as they saw it, similar to the recent persecution of the FBI and CIA by the muddleheaded liberals in the Carter Administration.
